- We Build -

We build
stronger communities
when we come together,
share our knowledge, and
work with a common goal.

Our voices matter
in the spaces
where decisions
are made.

We attend, we learn, we
ask questions, we support,
and we participate.

We invest in our babies
today by being informed,
involved, and intentional.

Together we create opportunities, open doors,
and leave a foundation for generations

Be the Example.
Stay Supreme.

Strong communities are not built by one person, one organization, or one generation. They are built when people with common goals come together, combine their knowledge and resources, and develop productive relationships centered on improving the conditions around them.

Building today means recognizing that real change requires more than identifying what is wrong. It requires participation. If decisions are being made about our schools, neighborhoods, housing, healthcare, public safety, economic development, and our babies' futures, then we should understand how those decisions are being made and find productive ways to participate in the process.

Community control begins with community involvement. We can attend school board, city council, county, neighborhood, and other public meetings. We can read agendas, ask informed questions, learn who represents our communities, and understand the issues being discussed. Some of us may attend and listen. Others may speak, organize, serve on boards or commissions, support community initiatives, or choose to seek positions where they can participate directly in decision-making.

Collaboration is equally important. We cannot expect one organization to address every need within our communities. When grassroots organizations, nonprofits, educators, professionals, businesses, parents, and residents communicate and work together, we can share resources, knowledge, relationships, and solutions.

We also need to recognize the skills already among our people. We need educators, healthcare professionals, attorneys, entrepreneurs, tradespeople, financial professionals, engineers, social workers, artists, and people from many other fields contributing what they know. We do not all have to perform the same function. We need to understand our function and how it can contribute to the whole.

Most importantly, we are building for the generations coming behind us. Our babies should see adults participating in their communities, solving problems, working together, creating opportunities, and taking responsibility for what happens around them. When we build today, we give them more than words. We give them examples. We give them access. We give them relationships, resources, knowledge, and a stronger foundation from which they can continue building.

Building strong communities requires more than one organization, program, or individual. It requires unity, collaboration, communication, and a shared commitment to the people. Our initiatives, nonprofits, and grassroots organizations, including CPR, P.E.A.C.E., Just Move Universal Outreach, Street Justice, The Fruits of Eden, Educate 2 Elevate, and others, have come together at one table to listen, exchange ideas and resources, and identify what our communities truly need.

That table is not closed. We are continuing to connect with other like-minded individuals, organizations, professionals, businesses, educators, advocates, and community leaders who are committed to strengthening our communities. No one person or organization has every answer or resource. By bringing together different skills, experiences, relationships, and areas of expertise, we can accomplish more collectively.

Each organization has its own purpose, but there are places where our missions intersect. Rather than competing or duplicating efforts, we can complement one another. One organization may have a resource another needs, while someone else may have the professional knowledge, community relationships, or experience necessary to move an idea forward. Collaboration allows us to listen, learn, advise one another, and develop stronger solutions.

Through our conversations, we have identified several areas requiring continued attention: education and financial literacy, the prison-to-school pipeline, gentrification and displacement, domestic abuse, healthcare, employment opportunities, and the rising costs of food, gas, and other necessities. These concerns are interconnected and directly affect the stability of our families and communities.
Education remains a foundation. Our babies need quality educational opportunities, literacy programs, mentorship, cultural knowledge, and environments that encourage critical thinking. Families also need practical financial knowledge that can help them budget, save, understand credit, pursue homeownership and entrepreneurship, and build resources for future generations.

We must also address conditions that push young people away from classrooms and opportunities and toward the criminal justice system. Prevention, mentorship, intervention, conflict resolution, educational support, and productive opportunities must be part of the solution. Likewise, addressing domestic abuse requires education, prevention, professional resources, safe spaces, and a community willing to recognize the problem.
Gentrification, healthcare, jobs, and the increasing cost of living also demand our attention. Residents need information about changes occurring in their neighborhoods and opportunities to participate in decisions affecting them. Families need access to quality healthcare, meaningful employment, career development, skilled trades, entrepreneurship, and economic opportunities that can create greater stability.

This is why coming together matters. Unity does not require uniformity. We do not have to become one organization or approach every issue in the same way. We can maintain our individual missions while recognizing where cooperation allows us to accomplish more.

We also want to continue expanding the table. We welcome other like-minded individuals and organizations already doing productive work to join the conversation, share what they are seeing, and explore where collaboration makes sense. Most importantly, the people directly affected must have a voice. We cannot determine what a community needs without listening to the community itself.

Our goal is to move beyond meetings and introductions toward meaningful action, shared resources, stronger programs, and measurable progress. Building today means connecting, organizing, listening, and working together today, so the generations coming behind us inherit stronger communities tomorrow. Peace!

- We Build -

We honor the past,
while building to last.
With Knowledge we grow,
through the work that we show.
Hand in hand, side by side,
with commitment as our guide.
For the babies yet to come,
we build today as one.
Through every test, we remain,
turning struggle into gain.
With each new step that we take,
a stronger future we create.
Lay the foundation.
Continue the elevation.

Be the Example.
Stay Supreme.

Our history shows us what can be built when committed individuals come together. The Nation we know today did not develop overnight. It took teaching, sacrifice, consistency, organization, and people who were willing to put what they knew into action. More than six decades later, that responsibility belongs to us.

Commitment means showing up, communicating, accepting responsibility, supporting one another, and following through. It means turning knowledge into action that benefits the people and strengthens our communities.

Progress is not just measured by how many years have passed. It is measured by what we have learned, what we have preserved, and what we have improved, and what we are preparing for the generations coming behind us.

Savior Cee (South Carolina) continues to grow through education, youth development, community involvement, collaboration, and organization. Our babies are being included, given opportunities to learn, create, speak, serve, and understand that they have a place in what we are building. Our adults are identifying their skills and finding ways to contribute to the collective.

As we celebrate our history, we must also ask ourselves what the next generation will be able to say about what we built. Will they inherit only stories, or will they also inherit institutions, resources, opportunities, knowledge, property, programs, and strong Ciphers that we helped establish?

The foundation was laid for us. Now we have the responsibility to continue building upon it. Our strength will not be measured by how many names we can place on a list, but by what those names represent, people willing to contribute, work together, remain accountable, and turn ideas into action.

Our history shows us where we came from. Our work shows where we are today. And what we organize, build, and leave behind will help determine where our babies can go tomorrow.

Commitment in Action: Different Hands. Different Skills. One Foundation.

A strong cipher is not built by one person, nor does progress require everyone to perform the same function. It is built when individuals recognize what they bring to the table, accept responsibility, and use their Knowledge, skills, experiences, and resources for the benefit of the whole.

In Savior Cee, we are continuing to strengthen that foundation by developing a committee of committed individuals. Some are educators, organizers, parents, mentors, creators, community advocates, and professionals. Others bring years of experience within our Nation, while some are developing new skills and discovering where they can contribute. Each has something valuable to add.

Commitment, however, is more than having your name associated with a committee. It means showing up, communicating, completing assignments, sharing ideas, helping where help is needed, and remaining accountable to what we say we are going to do. Sometimes it means leading. Other times it means supporting someone else who is leading. Both are necessary.

We also understand that building together does not mean we will always agree. Different perspectives can strengthen the Cipher when we are willing to listen, communicate respectfully, and remain focused on the larger objective. The goal is not for everyone to think alike. The goal is to take what each person knows and determine how we can use it collectively to produce progress.

Our committee is not the finish line. It is another step toward greater organization. What matters now is what we produce from it: stronger educational efforts, greater community involvement, opportunities for our babies, economic development, resources, programs, and a Cipher prepared to meet the needs of today while planning for tomorrow.

The foundation was laid before us, but every generation has a responsibility to add something to it. We honor those who built before us by continuing the work, not simply talking about what once was, but creating evidence of what is and preparing for what can be.

There is room for different hands, different talents, and different responsibilities because there is plenty of work to be done.

"Everybody does not have to carry the same brick. We just have to know what we are building together."

Understanding's Legal Corner

"Know the System: Part Two"

Look at Johnny Cochran and the O.J. Simpson trial. Whatever one's personal opinion about Simpson's guilt or innocence, Cochran understood the courtroom, understood reasonable doubt, understood how to challenge the prosecution's evidence and knew how to communicate his argument to a jury. He knew the system he was operating within, and he used that knowledge. There is a lesson in that for us.

We cannot afford to remain ignorant of laws that can profoundly affect our freedom, free and future. We should understand our rights. We should understand due process. We should understand how evidence works. We should understand what prosecutors must prove. We should understand appeals, legal research, court procedures, and the protections available to an accused person. Knowledge gives us something ignorance never can: options!

The purpose is not to manipulate the truth or escape accountability for wrongdoing. The purpose is to stop entering a complicated system without understanding its rules. Study it. Learn its language. Know your rights. Know its procedures. Know how those procedures have been used against us, but also learn how they can be used to protect us.

Then take that knowledge and put it into wisdom. Through practical understanding, we become better prepared to advocate for ourselves, our families, and our people. We cannot change yesterday, but we can become more knowledgeable today. The impossible was destroyed with the creation of the possible. Peace!

LEGAL TIP

Knowing your rights before you enter the legal system can make a difference. Learn the laws that apply to your situation, keep copies of important documents, read everything before signing it, document important conversations and deadlines, and ask questions when you do not understand legal language. Remember that you have the right to remain silent when questioned by law enforcement and the right to seek legal counsel. Knowledge of the system does not guarantee victory, but entering it informed is far better than entering it unaware.

DID YOU KNOW?

That the first Black woman to run for Vice President of the United States was born in Sumter, South Carolina?

Charlotta Spears Bass

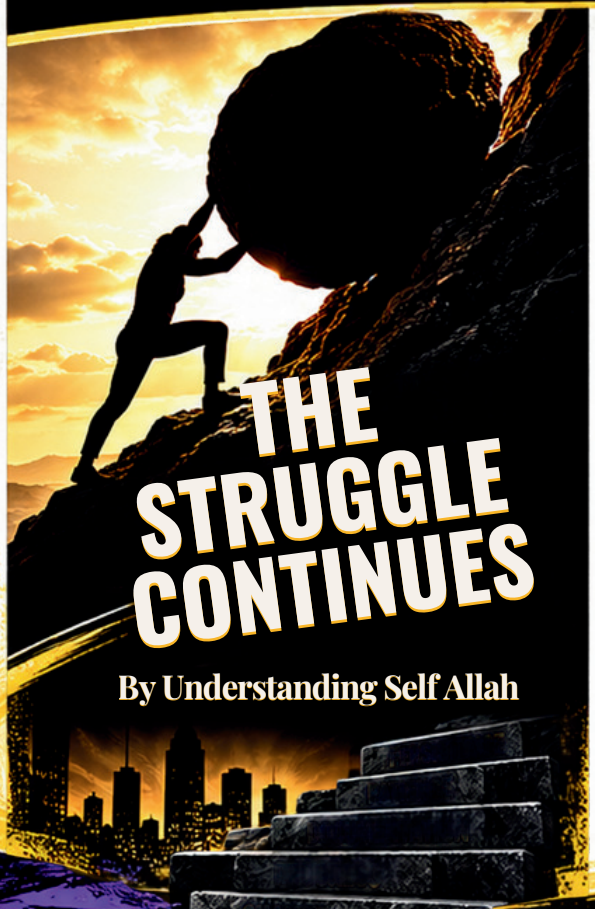

SUMTER, SOUTH CAROLINA

Charlotta Spears Bass became a pioneering journalist, civil rights activist, and political leader. After moving to California, she took over The Eagle, later known as The California Eagle, and became one of the first Black women in the United States to own and operate a newspaper. She used its pages to challenge racial discrimination, unfair employment practices, police violence, and housing segregation.

In 1952, Bass made history when she ran for vice president on the Progressive Party ticket, becoming the first Black woman nominated for vice president by a U.S. political party.

Her journey from Sumter, South Carolina, to the national political stage reminds us that our voices can become powerful tools when we have the courage to use them. Bass did not simply report what was happening around her...she used journalism, organizing, and political participation to challenge the conditions affecting Black communities.

By the 1930s, The California Eagle had grown to approximately 60,000 readers, making it the largest Black newspaper on the West Coast at the time.

The work continues. Due to certain issues being left out of the memorandum, I have created an amendment request to the policy to address what still needs to be corrected.

From the beginning, we were told that this task would not be easy. Real change requires persistence, patience, documentation, and the willingness to continue even when the process becomes difficult. This is another necessary step in that process. I ask that you allow me to do what is necessary for us. Let me continue completing the paperwork, addressing what was overlooked, and taking the proper steps to correct what needs to be corrected. The struggle does not end because an obstacle appears. We identify the problem, document it, address it, and keep moving forward.

Right now, I need everyone to remain patient and respectful while this work is being done. There is still more paperwork to complete and more steps that must be taken. I remain committed to doing my part, but this process requires time and patience.

If you are currently dealing with grievances, questions, or concerns, please contact our Prison Liaison, Yaa Majesty Earth, and her team at thefrutsofeden@gmail.com. This will help ensure concerns are communicated through the appropriate channel while I continue handling the work that needs to be done.

Allow me to do what is necessary for us. Remain patient. Stay peaceful. Let the process work. The struggle continues, and so does the work. Peace!

Read. Sign. Share. Keep It Moving.

Change requires more than recognizing a problem. It requires people willing to take action.

In the 19th century, the Struggle for Reentry, a social and political movement, was a call for a more just and equitable society, with a focus on the rights of the marginalized.
